It was the great faith, hope and charity of this great man which not only won for him his desired reward to be called "One who loved his fellow man" but the everlasting tribute of "One loved by his fellow man."

Edith May, the President of the National Beauty Contest, is a girl who has been in the heart of the nation's spotlight, leading the parade in the famous Miss America show. She has been in the spotlight since the first time she appeared in the show, and she has been in the spotlight ever since. She has been in the spotlight for so long that she has become a household name. She has been in the spotlight for so long that she has become a household name. She has been in the spotlight for so long that she has become a household name.

NO. 7—THE LESSON

By Edith May

Edna and I had planned to go shopping Saturday. We had spotted a cute dress in a window on Thirty-fourth street, and a hat and a few trinkets we wanted like mad. And they cost so little—

We got them and were just unpacking the parcels in our room when the telephone rang.

"Hello—hello!"

It was Friend Lady's voice and it sounded excited.

"Hello—I want Miss May! Edith!

Edna—"

"Yes—hello," I purred: "how do you do?"

"Is this you, Edith? Oh, how glad I am! I thought surely something dreadful had happened to you. Are you all right?"

"Why, of course—why? We've just come from shopping."

"Shopping! You've been shopping?"

A queer sound as of gurgles and gasps followed, and I began to wonder if Friend Lady were a little crazy.

"Is anything wrong?" I asked, alarmed.

"There was no answer for an instant—the sort of silence that is full of electricity, as though astonishment were preventing speech. Then, in an uncharacteristically calm voice, Friend Lady went on:

"No, dear, except that the stage manager is standing on his head because you weren't at the matinee today."

"Matinee! There's a matinee?" I turned my head.

"I never dreamed of it. No one told me. Oh, whatever shall I do?"

Words failed me. I was aghast at my ignorance. But how should I know about a matinee when nobody mentioned such a thing?

"It's all right," soothed Friend Lady; "no particular harm done. Only remember there are six night shows a week and two afternoons—Wednesdays and Saturdays. Good-by."

I hung up the receiver and fell into a chair.

Perhaps I could still get there in time for the last act! I scrambled into my hat and coat and flew to the theater. The stage-door man grunted. I flashed by him and up the iron stairs to the big dressing room, out of which the girls were just streaming, dressed for the final act. I was too late.

I leaned against the wall and sobbed.

"Don't hawl so, kid," said a voice at my shoulder: "what's the matter? Has your best fellow transferred his affections to you, or what?"

"Cause if he hasn't there's nothing in the world ought to make you turn on the shower like that."

I looked into the thickly-painted face of a girl I had never seen before in the show.

She had hard eyes and a coarse mouth, which was smiling at me in a curious sort of way.

"I didn't know there was a matinee today," I said in a choked voice, and started to move away.

"Aw—is that all? Say, I didn't know there was anything as green as you, kid, late side of the Palisades. Where you living?"

"McAlpin hotel," I answered.

"Shucks! What's the idea livin' like that? You can't have any fun in a hotel. Say, listen—"

She came close to me, holding my elbow and lowering her voice. "I got a swell idea."

"What's that?"

"Shucks! What's the idea livin' like that? You can't have any fun in a hotel. Say, listen—" the flat. My chum's just left to get married. Come on up and go halves with me. It'll cost you less and you can—"

"Thanks very much," I had got over my crying fit completely by this time, "but I have my cousin with me. We'd rather stay at the hotel."

The girl moved slowly off, looking over her hunched shoulder at me.

"Suit Yourself, Suit—"

"Suit yourself," she said, "but a girl that doesn't know enough to show up at the matinee oughta have a keeper—somebody that can teach her beans when the bag's open. Take it from me, kid, you'll never get nowhere in this business."

I often think she is right.

But I don't know that I want to.

State Prohibition Director W. Wayne Hindman and Prohibition Agent-in-charge Charles C. Gregg maintain that the supreme court decision on the face of it does not provide for the wholesale release of whiskey from government or commercial warehouses. Director Hindman characterized the interpretation "that whiskey could be withdrawn from commercial warehouses upon proof of ownership" as "utterly nonsensical."

Both the director and Agent-in-charge Gregg foresee "immense difficulties" in the apprehension of conviction of dry law violators should the revenue department declare for the release of liquors from warehouses.

"Should the whiskey now in storage be released," said Gregg, "the enforcement squads throughout the country will have to increase their personnel at least 500 per cent." This would equal an expense amounting in the millions.

According to Mr. Gregg, 95 per cent of the liquor withdrawn was removed on fake permits. "Now comes this possible multiplication of our troubles. The prohibition enforcer's lot is exceptionally tough," Gregg concluded.

The big point being raised in the Pittsburgh district is whether whiskey stored in the government warehouses can be withdrawn. It is generally believed that the revenue men will hold that the supply in commercial warehouses can be withdrawn.

Warehouses Robbed

Warehouses near Pittsburgh have been boldly robbed and truckload after truckload of whiskey stolen. About all the thieves got away safely. Thousands upon thousands of gallons of whiskey have trickled out of the warehouses into unlawful hands.

Since the United States supreme court decision permitting whiskey to be withdrawn in a legal manner, it is expected the 14,000,000 gallons still in the warehouses in the Pittsburgh district will move faster. The owners are expected to not lose much time getting their whiskey out of these warehouses lest thieves beat them to it. Of course, the thieves can't steal all of the 14,000,000 gallons, but if they keep up their activities in the future equal to those in the past year or so, they will make a pretty big dent in the available supply. So it is expected whiskey owners will act quickly.

At prohibition headquarters in the Bowen building here, it is stated that the release of the 14,000,000 gallons now in storage will have no nullifying effect on the Volstead amendment. Local federal authorities are awaiting the revenue department interpretation of the United States supreme court decision.

Should the internal revenue commission decide that the whiskey cannot be withdrawn, the owners of the whiskey are likely to seek an injunction from the federal court restraining the revenue department from interfering with their withdrawals. Around the federal building it was believed that the house would again reach the United States supreme court for a more definite interpretation.

Decision is Stagnant

Both the director and Agent-in-charge Gregg foresee "immense difficulties" in the apprehension of conviction of dry law violators should the revenue department declare for the release of liquors from warehouses.

"Should the whiskey now in storage be released," said Gregg, "the enforcement squads throughout the country will have to increase their personnel at least 500 per cent." This would equal an expense amounting in the millions.

According to Mr. Gregg, 95 per cent of the liquor withdrawn was removed on fake permits. "Now comes this possible multiplication of our troubles. The prohibition enforcer's lot is exceptionally tough," Gregg concluded.

The big point being raised in the Pittsburgh district is whether whiskey stored in the government warehouses can be withdrawn. It is generally believed that the revenue men will hold that the supply in commercial warehouses can be withdrawn.

Warehouses Robbed

Warehouses near Pittsburgh have been boldly robbed and truckload after truckload of whiskey stolen. About all the thieves got away safely. Thousands upon thousands of gallons of whiskey have trickled out of the warehouses into unlawful hands.

Since the United States supreme court decision permitting whiskey to be withdrawn in a legal manner, it is expected the 14,000,000 gallons still in the warehouses in the Pittsburgh district will move faster. The owners are expected to not lose much time getting their whiskey out of these warehouses lest thieves beat them to it. Of course, the thieves can't steal all of the 14,000,000 gallons, but if they keep up their activities in the future equal to those in the past year or so, they will make a pretty big dent in the available supply. So it is expected whiskey owners will act quickly.

At prohibition headquarters in the Bowen building here, it is stated that the release of the 14,000,000 gallons now in storage will have no nullifying effect on the Volstead amendment. Local federal authorities are awaiting the revenue department interpretation of the United States supreme court decision.

Should the internal revenue commission decide that the whiskey cannot be withdrawn, the owners of the whiskey are likely to seek an injunction from the federal court restraining the revenue department from interfering with their withdrawals. Around the federal building it was believed that the house would again reach the United States supreme court for a more definite interpretation.

Decision is Stagnant

State Prohibition Director W. Wayne Hindman and Prohibition Agent-in-charge Charles C. Gregg maintain that the supreme court decision on the face of it does not provide for the wholesale release of whiskey from government or commercial warehouses. Director Hindman characterized the interpretation "that whiskey could be withdrawn from commercial warehouses upon proof of ownership" as "utterly nonsensical."
